Keynote abstract

The famous author Jack London (1876-1916) and the Hollywood film pioneer Burton Holmes (1870-1958) visited Korea in the early 1900s on very different missions. Both were enthusiastic photographers and captivating writers, yet their impressions of the country could not differ more. Burton Holmes had made world travel his profession and entertained large audiences with lantern slides lectures, filling famous venues such as Carnegie Hall in New York. He also shot the first documentary film of Seoul, and published his photographs and texts in a book series of 'travelogues' - a word coined by him. London, on the other hand, was employed by William Randolph Hearst for the San Francisco Examiner to report on the Russo-Japanese War in 1904 and wrote about his adventures on the way to the front at the Yalu River. By analyzing their photographs together with their texts, this lecture will explore questions such as: What do London and Holmes have in common, and what separates them? What was their intention, who their audiences? How do their personal and social backgrounds influence their perception of Korea? Do texts and images tell the same stories? How much do they tell us about the country, and how does Korea look back at these foreigners?
